

*no comma between
subject and verb*

The Grimm brothers' fairy tale "The Fox and the Cat," seems to communicate sp theme, "Pride and arrogance are self delusions of power that can leave you open to your enemies." The fox himself best expresses this when he says, "Oh, you retched beard-cleaner, you piebald fool, you hungry mouse-hunter... How many arts do you understand?" (Grimm 129). This explains the theme because of how the fox and the cat act, everybody knows the cat can climb a tree and people hunt foxes, not cats. explain "question word" – instead, say how they act

Six (6) edits are suggested. ↑

The Grimm brothers' fairy tale "The Fox and the Cat" seems to communicate the theme, "Pride and arrogance are self delusions of power that can leave you open to your enemies." The fox himself best expresses this when he says, "Oh, you wretched beard-cleaner, you piebald fool, you hungry mouse-hunter... How many arts do you understand?" (Grimm 129). Ironically, the only necessary art at that moment is how to get away from the hunting dogs: the cat climbs a tree; the talented fox gets caught.

↑ • Which ones did the student fix?
↑ • How many were missed?

Now try it again:

*no comma between
subject and verb*

The Grimm brothers' fairy tale "The Fox and the Cat," seems to communicate sp theme, "Pride and arrogance are self delusions of power that can leave you open to your enemies." The fox himself best expresses this when he says, "Oh, you retched beard-cleaner, you piebald fool, you hungry mouse-hunter... How many arts do you understand?" (Grimm 129). This explains the theme because of how the fox and the cat act, everybody knows the cat can climb a tree and people hunt foxes, not cats. explain "question word" – instead, say how they act

↓ • Which ones did the student fix?
↓ • How many were missed?

The Grimm brothers' fairy tale "The Fox and the Cat" seems to communicate the theme, "Pride and arrogance are self delusions of power that can leave you open to your enemies." The fox himself best expresses this when he says, "Oh, you wretched beard-cleaner, you piebald fool, you hungry mouse-hunter... How many arts do you understand?" (Grimm 129). Ironically, the only necessary art at that moment is how to get away from the hunting dogs: the cat climbs a tree; the talented fox gets caught.

*I rewrote this whole sentence.
In this version "how" is explained immediately after.*

Work Cited

Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm. Classic Grimm Fairy Tales. Translated by Edgar Taylor and Marian Edwardes. ReadaClassic, 2010. Print.